Hi Brendan,

Here is a University statement:

President Barchi commends members of our community for highlighting this issue and fully supports developing a plan to reach carbon neutrality at Rutgers University by 2030.

Rutgers is proud to be the home of world-renowned experts on climate sciences and climate policy, and leads by its actions. All new construction at Rutgers is built to LEED standards. Rutgers' 3,400 solar panels on Livingston Campus are capable of providing energy to the entire campus. Making sustainable choices in purchasing and operations is a priority for the University.

President Barchi looks forward to the active participation of the University's climate change experts in formulating a plan that contributes to the extensive, ongoing work on sustainability already happening across the University.

Best,

Dory

Hi Brendan,

I don't know the answer to your first question. The others are very broad but I will look into them.

Rutgers remembered the legacy of Dr. Joachim Messing, the director of the Waksman Institute of Microbiology at Rutgers and a microbiologist scientist who made groundbreaking developments in molecular genetics, who was known for not patenting his influential work. Read the full story here.

Inside Beat: Primary of podcasts:
Alternative media's
influence in 2020
race

In response to the tiresome triangulation at the most recent Democratic debates, Samir Patki wrote a story about how legacy media (ABC, New York Times, CNN) approach political discourse in comparison to how alternative media, namely podcasts, discuss policy and our shared future. This is a story for political junkies and media theorist alike. Read the full story here.

Opinions: Broken windows policing failure, adjustments needed

In the mid-1970s, New Jersey started an initiative, providing money to departments to remove police officers from their patrol car, instead promoting walking beats. Read the full column here.
